Supporting Vocational Aspirations through evidence-based models of primary and community mental health care

Professor Eóin Killackey Associate Director, Research at Orygen www.orygen.org.au is visiting Aotearoa New Zealand as part of his work with the World Economic Forum in developing a global youth model of care and an investment framework.

During his visit here, he has kindly offered to give a presentation on evidence-based models of primary and community mental health care. The timing of this couldn't be better with the government's response to He Ara Oranga's committing to a new frontline mental health service in primary care.

Eóin is a clinical psychologist and researcher, with a focus on helping young people with mental illness recover well. This includes supporting education and employment aspirations and improving physical health. He also focuses his research on service system reform in the mental health and addiction system.

This is a unique opportunity to hear from a global expert on models of mental health care, so do join us.
